Case study on Employee Referral Scheme

Group submission

AN EMPLOYEE REFERRAL PROGRAM

Annabelle Adams is the HR Director for Missouri Telemarketing in Bengaluru. The company employs about 2500 people, of whom 90 percent are part time telemarketing sales personnel. Most of these employees are college students, housewives or retired people who work part time for, depending on their seniority and shift. Annual job satisfaction surveys indicate that the employees like their supervisors, wages and benefits and the workplace facility. Turnover, however, is currently averaging 25 percent due to the hours (evening and weekend shifts must be worked by all employees for at least half of their total hours) and stress due to the constant pressure of meeting sales targets. Employees also complain of the lack of social interaction at work due to their isolation (each employee sits in a small cubicle that performs the dialing and record keeping functions).

The company is growing rapidly and thus must constantly recruit and train new sales personnel. The president, Mary Anne Ryan, has decided that the company should try an employee prize referral program as a means of recruiting. She has just returned from a conference, where she heard several CEO's describe how they successfully utilized referral programs. Ryan has directed Adams to develop an employee referral program that will recruit at least 150 new workers in the next three months. She has provided a budget of Rs.5,00,000 to cover all prizes and expenses directly related to the program (routine HR staff time is not included).

1. What prizes should Adams recommend the program offer to employees? Why?
2. How should the program be communicated to employees?
3. How should the success of the program be determined?
4. Whom should Adams consult for advice in designing the program?
